We share our June GMV update across major e-commerce and food delivery platforms, together with the latest May market data. Recently, investor discussions have centered on one question: Will Coupang benefit as Koreans become wealthier? We believe this is the wrong lens through which to view the opportunity. Instead, the key issue is how spending patterns are evolving within Korea's increasingly polarized consumer landscape. In this note, we outline our views on the Korean retail market and assess the respective growth runways for Coupang and Naver.

Korea is getting richer, but not equally. Korea's affluent population continues to expand. The number of high-net-worth individuals (HNWIs) reached 576k in 2025 (+3.3% YoY), while their share of the population increased to 0.9% from 0.7% in 2020. At the same time, wealth concentration is accelerating: the top decile now accounts for 46.1% of national net wealth in 2025, up 1.6ppt YoY, while the highest income quintile captured 45.2% of household income in Q1 2026, up 0.8ppt YoY. These trends point to an increasingly pronounced K-shaped economy.

Premium spending is flowing to department stores, not groceries. Affluent consumers do not simply buy more everyday necessities. Instead, incremental spending is increasingly concentrated in premium and luxury brands such as Chanel, Van Cleef & Arpels, and Cartier. Semi-durable goods such as fashion continue to outgrow most retail categories, while department stores (+19% YoY in May) are consistently outperforming hypermarkets (-7% YoY in May) despite serving a narrower customer base. In other words, rising wealth benefits premium retail channels more than mass-market grocery platforms.

June data suggests Coupang may be losing share. Coupang's GMV grew 4% YoY in June, according to Wiseapp data released on July 3. In comparison, Naver's GMV increased 14% YoY over the same period. Meanwhile, KOSIS online retail sales data, published on July 1, showed 9% YoY market growth (excl. food delivery and auto) in May. Given that Coupang delivered 10% YoY growth in May, the June result suggests that its growth has decelerated to only low single-digit levels above, or potentially below, overall market growth.

Naver's share gain story remains intact. Naver's stronger growth performance is being driven by its expanding Brand Store ecosystem, which is well positioned to capture demand in item categories such as semi-durable goods. As a result, Naver appears to be gaining share in higher-value merchandise categories where brand engagement and product discovery are key differentiators. Naver appears to be pulling ahead while remaining in full combat mode through aggressive pricing and 1P fulfillment investments (Link).

Baemin holds the line as Coupang Eats growth normalizes. In food delivery, Baemin (Delivery Hero, covered by Annick Maas) and Coupang Eats posted 10% and 12% YoY GTV growth, respectively, in June, while market shares remained broadly unchanged at 63% and 37%. With growth rates converging, Coupang Eats' share gain story appears to be maturing. The next key strategic question is whether Coupang Eats adopts a 3P marketplace model to expand beyond major metropolitan areas (Link).

INVESTMENT IMPLICATIONS

We rate Coupang Underperform and Naver Outperform.

We reiterate our view that in e-commerce, competition ultimately dictates margins. Naver remains firmly in combat mode in Commerce, with recent promotional activity appearing increasingly aggressive. In terms of incremental GMV growth, we believe Naver Brand Store ecosystem is better positioned to capture demand, potentially gaining share.

We trimmed our Coupang Q2 estimates to reflect: (1) c.4% YoY revenue growth, impacted by foreign exchange headwinds, and (2) the USD 410 million fine, which we expect to be recognized in Q2 OG&A, reducing operating profit and EPS. We modelled Q2 adjusted EBITDA margin at 2%, in line with management's guidance from the previous earnings call for a consolidated adjusted EBITDA margin contraction of approximately 300-400 bps YoY.

We revised our Naver 2026-2027 EPS estimates slightly due to changes in non-operating costs.
