U.S. Medtech stock performance has been abysmal. Our coverage has underperformed the S&P by 4600bps over the past year (Exhibit 1), and the medtech sector multiple has compressed by 30% since November (Exhibit 2). While investors worry about several macro factors (slowing utilization, margin pressure, GLP-1 impact), we believe medtech weakness is more about single-stock stories that have gotten more complicated. In today's note, we reflect on some of the complications that have crept into medtech stock stories. Medtech fundamentals remain solid, in our view, and per Exhibit 4, valuations have come in dramatically for most of our coverage. For investors who are willing to live with stories that have a bit of hair on them, we see very attractive risk/reward for many quality medtech names across our coverage.

U.S. Medtech stock performance has been horrendous. Over the last year, U.S. Medtech has underperformed the S&P 500 by just under 5000 bps (see Exhibit 1), making it the worst subsector within healthcare by a wide margin. The P/E multiple for the sector has been slashed by 30% over the last ~6 months (see Exhibit 2). Within our coverage, most stocks are down significantly year to date, with BSX and PODD as the most notable underperformers (Exhibit 3).

EXHIBIT 2: U.S. Medtech P/E multiples are down 30% since November 2025. We haven't seen these levels sustainably since before 2017

HOW DID WE GET HERE?

What's driving this weakness for medtech stocks? What has changed? As medtech multiples plunge to 10-year lows, investors have been questioning whether something is fundamentally wrong with the sector. Could procedure growth be slowing down? Will inflation (e.g., oil, resins, memory/semiconductors) put pressure on margins? Could GLP-1 growth disrupt medtech markets?

These are all red herrings, in our view. We see nothing wrong with medtech fundamentals. The problem for medtech, in our view, is more about stories. As investors remain captivated by AI-related stories, the stories for historically strong medtech stocks have gotten increasingly complicated. And in a world where a narrow set of AI winners are driving incredibly strong returns, investors have very little patience for complicated medtech stories.

INCREASINGLY COMPLICATED STORIES

Stories have become increasingly complicated for many medtech stocks. Boston Scientific (BSX) has had a particularly dramatic fall from grace, and we attribute a fair amount of sector weakness to BSX's collapse. But sadly, BSX is not alone. Below, we summarize several medtech stock stories that have grown increasingly complicated over the past year.

Boston Scientific (BSX). BSX's P/E multiple has been slashed from a high of over 36x in early 2025 to 12.5x today. After establishing itself as a reliable high-single-digit grower, BSX's organic growth shot up to 16% (!) in both 2024 and 2025, driven primarily by two key franchises: Farapulse (PFA) and Watchman (LAAC). Watchman revenue doubled from ~$1bn in 2022 to ~$2bn in 2025, and Farapulse drove BSX's EP business to quadruple from $800mn in 2023 to $3.3bn in 2025. After CMS reimbursement coding for concomitant Farapulse+Watchman procedures went live Oct 2024, concomitant procedures drove Watchman organic growth from 18% in 3Q24 to a peak of 35% in 3Q25. Investor concerns about PFA competition started to percolate during the course of 2025 as BSX EP growth began to decelerate. Then in 4Q25, BSX U.S. EP sales missed consensus by 6%, and Watchman organic growth inflected from its peak of 35% to 29%. Both franchises continued to decelerate in 1Q26 and Urology growth was weak on Axonics integration hiccups, leading to a dramatic guidance cut after Q1, where FY26 organic growth was cut from 10%-11% to 6.5%-8.0% (see our 1Q26 recap). It was a gutsy move for management to cut the FY26 guide after one quarter of a new 12-quarter long-range plan (for 10%+ organic growth) issued in Sep 2025. Just 5 weeks after the 1Q26 call, BSX lowered Watchman expectations again at our Bernstein Strategic Decisions Conference (see our BSX SDC recap). Additional complications to the story include a couple of controversial deals: the $14.5bn Penumbra acquisition in January (larger than the typical tuck-in deals to which investors have become accustomed) and the $1.5bn MiRus investment in May (which triggered investor skepticism given BSX's two previous high-profile failures in TAVR).

Abbott (ABT). In 4Q25, sales growth slowed to 3.0% organic (a 3% miss), driven largely by an unexpected 9% decline in ABT's Nutrition business (missed by 12%) (see our 4Q25 recap). The decline was driven by price cuts (primarily in the Adult segment) and infant formula market share losses stemming from the loss of a large WIC contract in 3Q25. Abbott had been raising Nutrition prices since 2022 in an attempt to offset higher manufacturing costs, but those increases began to weigh on volume. Management took price down in the quarter to address this and guided the Nutrition business to a challenged 1H26 with a return to growth in 2H26. The story did not get any cleaner in 1Q26, as sales ex-Exact acquisition and other adjustments continued growing slowly at ~3.0% organic. ABT's continuous glucose monitor (CGM) sales continued to decelerate (on market weakness + ABT recall in 4Q25) and the company's Structural Heart division lost market share (see our 1Q26 recap). ABT has dropped ~26% YTD.

Stryker (SYK) suffered a cyberattack on March 11 which disrupted global operations. Although the company primed investors for disappointing Q1 results through a series of 8-Ks, the disruption impacted Q1 sales more heavily than expected. Organic growth landed at 2.4% in 1Q26, 5% short of consensus, as the cyberattack delayed revenue recognition and disrupted manufacturing and supply chain operations. Management reiterated FY26 guidance on revenue-recognition tailwinds and backlog recovery on capital equipment. However, some investors remained concerned that the severity of the disruption could make guidance difficult to achieve, particularly now that 2H26 expectations call for 11% organic growth (see our 1Q26 recap). SYK has dropped ~10% YTD.

Insulet (PODD) has been a popular short since the company's November 2025 investor day, as investors worry about competitive patch pumps and potential price pressure in the pharmacy channel. PODD shares came under more pressure when the company announced a voluntary medical device correction on March 12 (see 8-K), identifying a manufacturing issue whereby certain pods from specific lots may have a small tear in the internal tubing that delivers insulin. The issue can lead to insulin leaking inside the pod rather than being fully infused in the body. At the time, Insulet had received 18 reports of serious adverse events associated with high blood glucose levels, including hospitalization and diabetic ketoacidosis (DKA), and no deaths had been reported. The company informed users about affected lots (pods involved amounted to ~1.5% of annual Omnipod 5 production globally) and offered replacement pods at no cost to users. On April 10, PODD confirmed 11 additional adverse events (bringing the total to 29) and no deaths associated with the manufacturing issue. On April 29, the FDA mischaracterized the manufacturing issue as having resulted in "476 serious injuries and no deaths," further hitting the stock by -12.5% on the day (see our thoughts on the March 12 recall and follow-ups). On May 26, the company announced a separate voluntary medical device correction, identifying a manufacturing issue that resulted in 24 reports of serious adverse events (no deaths) and affected ~8.5% of 2025 Omnipod 5 production. PODD has fallen ~46% YTD.

Medline (MDLN) reported strong revenue growth results in their first full quarter after their IPO, but adj EBITDA of $776mn missed consensus ($784mn) by 1% (see our 1Q26 recap). Management explained that the team had decided to accelerate investments in the business given strong revenue performance, but the small EBITDA miss carried outside weight given market expectations that companies should execute cleanly in their first full quarter as a public company, and MDLN shares plunged by 12% before settling at -7.3% on the day. An FDA recall on April 17, FDA warning letter on May 28, news of a fire destroying a California distribution center on June 12, and general concerns about oil prices and sponsors selling down their positions have also put pressure on the name. MDLN has dropped ~10% YTD.

Medtronic (MDT) was the top-performer in medtech in 2025, but the story has become a bit more complicated this year. Disappointing long-term data released in February was a setback for MDT's TAVR business, and the March IPO of MiniMed (MMED, not covered) fell short of the company's expectations. FY27 is a high-stakes year for MDT, as the company needs to capitalize on several high-profile launches including Affera, RDN, Altaviva, and Hugo. After weaker EPS growth over the past 4 years (-5%, -2%, +6%, +1%), MDT needs to pull it all together in FY27 and deliver real EPS growth. MDT has fallen ~16% YTD.

Intuitive Surgical (ISRG) continues to deliver strong financial performance, with 1Q26 sales growth of 23% and EPS growth of 38%, both strong beats vs. consensus (see our 1Q26 recap). Forward estimates continue to move up, but the multiple has been dragged down by weakness across the medtech sector. When BSX was trading at a 35x P/E multiple, investors didn't mind paying 70x or more for ISRG. But with BSX at 12.5x, some investors worry that ISRG looks expensive at 36x. Fundamentals have been strong, but as the share price has struggled, investors ponder questions about the durability of procedure growth, remanufactured instruments, Chinese competitors, and new systems from MDT and JNJ. ISRG is down ~29% YTD.

IS THERE SOMETHING WRONG WITH MEDTECH FUNDAMENTALS?

With such notable, sustained weakness across the majority of stocks in the medtech sector, investors have understandably wondered whether there's something fundamentally wrong with the space. Several thematic factors have been teed up as possible explanations for sector weakness. As we noted above, we believe these are all red herrings. We believe the problem is more about single stock stories getting more complicated across the group. We discuss a few of these thematic factors below.

Slowing utilization growth. Hospital utilization has been strong for some time, and investors worry utilization growth could slow at some point, perhaps driven in part by some people getting kicked off insurance (ACA exchanges and Medicaid) and losing access to certain procedures. Some large hospital systems have speculated that utilization growth may begin to decelerate in 2H26. Medtech companies have told a different story, with teams fairly unanimously reporting continued strength in underlying procedure growth despite some mostly immaterial weather-related impact in 1Q26:

"What I will say in terms of the underlying market is that it's solid and underlying demand is what we expected. Now we did see some procedural softness early in the quarter, but nothing that we would define really as material. While certain regions, particularly here in the U.S., you will recall we experienced some periods of severe weather in late January and early February, that was largely consistent with normal seasonal patterns" - JNJ 1Q26 call

"Turning to the environment, underlying demand across our businesses remained healthy in Q1, even as the cyber incident created operational disruption. Procedural volumes were solid, supported by favorable demographics and the continued adoption of robotic assisted surgery. The hospital CapEx environment also remains steady, and our capital order book remains elevated as we enter the remainder of the year." - SYK 1Q26 call

Hospitals and MCOs saw a bit of softness in 1Q26 due to a mild flu season and weather-related disruptions, but most are calling for stable growth in utilization overall:

"As we monitor underlying utilization trends, they remain consistent with the high levels we saw in the prior year. At this distance, we anticipate trend to remain at the anticipated levels for 2026." - UNH 1Q26 call

Margin pressures. The Iran conflict led to a period of higher freight costs and created supply chain issues and gross margin concerns (e.g., higher resin prices). Higher input costs for semiconductors and memory has raised concerns as well. Investors remember that medtech stocks did not fare well during inflation concerns in 2022, and they worry inflation could continue to cause problems for the group. So far, medtech companies appear unfazed by these margin pressures:

"As it relates to oil costs, I mean I think that's an impact that it's too early to tell. We're not seeing any of that in our cost right now. We're not seeing freight rates increase from our suppliers right now." - ABT 1Q26 call

"Today, we have seen no material supply disruptions, a minor freight cost increase in the quarter that we're able to absorb. From a supply standpoint, most of our key products are dual-source, if not three sources. We got at least one year of pulling, so this is not something that we're concerned about. So, we're not seeing any distribution challenges there. So, again, so far, life is good." - ZBH 1Q26 call

GLP-1 impact. Growing access to weight loss medications has raised questions about impact on medical device businesses, particularly in certain end markets (e.g., bariatric surgery, diabetes, OSA). We all remember the impact on medtech stocks in 2H23, and though most medtech stocks recovered and have appeared to shrug off GLP-1-related fears, growing access to oral weight loss drugs could revive concerns.

WHAT CAN GET MEDTECH GOING AGAIN?

As we explain above, we see nothing wrong with medtech fundamentals. These are quality companies operating in attractive oligopoly markets, medtech innovation continues at a rapid pace, and there are plenty of secular tailwinds that will continue to drive growth. The problem for medtech, in our view, is more about single stock stories that have gotten a bit more complicated over the past year. As long as captivating AI-related stories continue to drive outperformance for a narrow basket of names, it's difficult to get investors interested in medtech stories that have some hair on them. So, where do we go from here? What can get medtech going again?

First off, it certainly wouldn't hurt if a bit of air came out of the AI balloon. Our macro team believes breadth is the story and forecasts a period of rotation/dispersion. We're seeing a bit of that today, and we'd certainly welcome a bit more.

More broadly, we forecast progressive recovery for idiosyncratic risks are retired one by one. Perhaps Stryker can deliver a big Q2 beat and restore confidence that the business will continue strong execution despite the cyberattack-related hiccup. If Abbott can show recovery in Nutrition and stabilization in Structural Heart, investors might start to get excited about broadening access for CGM and the growth opportunity in EP. Perhaps Intuitive Surgical's portfolio of launches (dV5, Ion, SP, XiR, AI) can continue to drive strong quarterly financial performance, and maybe investors will find it harder to ignore ISRG as estimates continue to march higher.

Recovery for Boston Scientific would go a long way to restoring confidence in the group. Questions continue to swirl about decelerating growth for Watchman and EP. As we get clarity on when and where growth rates will bottom out for these key franchises, and as reset LRP expectations begin to come into focus, we see the potential for dramatic recovery over the next 12-24 months.

Per Exhibit 4, valuations have come in dramatically for most of our coverage. For investors who are willing to live with stories that have a bit of hair on them, we see very attractive risk/reward for many quality medtech names across our coverage.
