U.S. Medtech stocks took another punch yesterday, as HCA (covered by Lance Wilkes) pre-released 2Q26 revenue and highlighted a 2.3% decline in same-facility inpatient surgery volumes and a 3.4% decline in same-facility outpatient surgery volumes (see PR and Lance's take). HCA shares finished the day down 7%, and several of our stocks were down almost as much (ISRG/SYK). JNJ reported mixed MedTech results this morning, which probably won't provide relief for medtech stocks after yesterday's weakness. We spoke to medtech management teams and offer thoughts on sector weakness below.

Investors are concerned, so the HCA announcement hit hard. U.S. Medtech stock performance has been abysmal. Our coverage has underperformed the S&P 500 by 5000bps over the past year (Exhibit 1), and the medtech sector multiple has compressed by over 30% since November (Exhibit 2). Given how bad medtech performance has been, investors naturally worry that something is fundamentally wrong with the sector. Concerns are focused around a few themes: slowing utilization growth, margin pressure, and (to a lesser extent) GLP-1 impact.

Hospital commentary has stoked fears that utilization growth could slow in 2H26, driven in part by declining enrollment in ACA plans and cuts to Medicaid. Recent alt data trends and survey work have not assuaged investor fears about the health of underlying medtech procedure volumes. With investors on edge, yesterday's announcement from HCA hit particularly hard, especially given the nature of the update—a couple of concerning numbers in a PR showing declines in inpatient and outpatient procedures with no public commentary from the company to put the numbers in context.

We have been on the road recently, and we have heard investor concerns loud and clear. We have defended the group, arguing that weakness has been more about single stock stories that have gotten more complicated than it is about a deteriorating macro environment (see our recent Deadtech forever? note). In a world where AI-related stories continue to command so much attention, investors have very little patience for complicated medtech stories.

Medtech management teams see healthy end markets. In our discussions with medtech companies, we do not hear concern about underlying market health. In fact, most companies point to continued steady/strong procedure volume growth. We caught up with ZBH yesterday, and they reiterated that (1) ACA is a LSD % of U.S. procedures, (2) Medicaid is LSD % of U.S. procedures, so (3) ACA and Medicaid together account for something at the low end of MSD % of U.S. procedures (say ~4%). Obviously, ACA and Medicaid programs are not going to zero, so ZBH felt the reaction to the HCA pre-release was overblown. The company wouldn't comment on Q2 procedures specifically, of course, but they characterized the market as "fine."

DETAILS

We also spoke with a private ortho company yesterday who hasn't noticed any change in market volume trends, and we connected with MDT who sees underlying markets as healthy and believes hospitals will push to do more elective procedures as hospital financials come under increased pressure.

No help from JNJ? This morning, JNJ reported 2Q26 MedTech sales of $4.55bn in the U.S., which missed consensus by ~1.7% (~$80mn) on U.S. organic growth of 4.1%. Most of the U.S. weakness came from lower-than-expected Abiomed U.S. sales (~$60mn miss), which may be a JNJ-specific issue. U.S. Knees missed by 3% ($6mn), and U.S. Spine missed by 1% ($3mn), while U.S. Surgery was 1.5% ahead of expectations (+$19mn). Outside the U.S., JNJ MedTech sales grew 3.2% organic to $4.37bn, slightly ahead of consensus.

From the headline numbers and commentary in JNJ's Q2 earnings presentation, we do not see any flashing signs of a slowdown in U.S. procedure volumes, but these numbers probably will not provide any relief for medtech stocks. JNJ's weakness in cardiovascular may raise some eyebrows, and investors will not find comfort in JNJ's small misses in U.S. Knees and U.S. Spine. Medtech investors will be listening closely to JNJ's commentary about medtech market health.

What can get medtech going again? As of this morning, we have a hard time squaring HCA's declining Q2 procedure trend with the reassuring commentary we hear from medtech management teams regarding the health of underlying markets. At this point, we continue to believe medtech stock weakness is more about single stock stories that have gotten more complicated. Let's see what we hear from JNJ and from medtech management teams as they report Q2 results over the coming days and weeks.

Sadly, momentum has become an increasingly important factor driving medtech valuations. Medtech stocks that were loved in late 2024 at all-time-high valuations are now hated at 10-year-low valuations. We're not yet willing to concede that market health is deteriorating, but even if that turns out to be the case, there must be opportunity for investors at these valuations (see Exhibit 3). After all, these are quality companies operating in attractive oligopoly markets, medtech innovation continues at a rapid pace, and there are plenty of secular tailwinds that will continue to drive growth.

We forecast progressive recovery for the group as idiosyncratic risks are retired one by one. It doesn't look like medtech will get much help from JNJ's Q2 results. We don't expect to get much help from Abbott, either, but if ABT can show recovery in Nutrition and stabilization in Structural Heart, investors might start to get excited about broadening access for CGM and the growth opportunity in EP. Perhaps Intuitive Surgical's portfolio of launches (dV5, Ion, SP, XiR, AI) can continue to drive strong quarterly financial performance, and maybe investors will find it harder to ignore ISRG as estimates continue to march higher. Perhaps Stryker can deliver a healthy Q2 beat and restore confidence that the business will continue strong execution despite the cyberattack-related hiccup. Recovery for Boston Scientific would go a long way to restoring confidence in the group. Questions continue to swirl about decelerating growth for Watchman and EP. As we get clarity on when and where growth rates will bottom out for these key franchises, and as reset LRP expectations begin to come into focus, we see the potential for dramatic recovery over the next 12-24 months.

Bottom line: For investors who are willing to live with stories that have a bit of hair on them, we see very attractive risk/reward for many quality medtech names across our coverage. We believe ISRG is an incredible opportunity below $400, and we like SYK going into Q2. We believe BSX shares have the potential to double over the next couple of years, though we admit it could take several quarters to get better visibility and rebuild investor confidence.

EXHIBIT 1: Over the last 12 months, U.S. Medtech has underperformed the S&P 500 (by 5000bps!) and has lagged all other healthcare subsectors

EXHIBIT 2: U.S. Medtech P/E multiples are down over 30% since November 2025. We haven't seen these levels sustainably since before 2017

EXHIBIT 3: For most of our coverage, multiples have been slashed by 20%-60% over the last 18 months
