A year of extremes. 2026 has continued to be a frustrating year for our Japan Video Gaming coverage. While the companies we like continue to do well fundamentally, market flows dominated by AI capex spend and geopolitical omnishambles have continued to contribute to multiple compression... and investor sentiment bordering on resignation. This note represents our latest quarterly look at sector risk-reward, and a summary of our takeaways after a series of meetings with our coverage companies.

Capcom and Konami taking care of business. There's not a lot Capcom and Konami can do to turn themselves into bottlenecks in the AI capex build-out. Leaving that aside, both companies continue to execute strongly, and now trade on forward PE multiples meaningfully below long-term averages. Pragmata sales have exceeded targets built into Capcom's guidance for new game units in FY3/27E, and an MH Wilds expansion announcement now feels more likely than not. Konami confirmed very strong eFootball growth in April and May, which should signal a large Q1 beat. The debate on a post-World Cup monetisation pull-back will continue... but strong user growth and lower platform fees bodes well for outer year growth. The pair remain our top picks in the sector.

Even Square Enix has found a way to sound better. Catalog growth and Switch 2 version releases should help raise the floor for Square Enix earnings. Nintendo pointing to a willingness to add remake titles to the first-party cadence felt additive to hopes for a 2027 rebound (with Pokémon Wind & Waves already) confirmed. We remain somewhat concerned at how Bandai Namco plans to deliver on guidance for a jump in Digital profits in H2 FY3/27E... but Toy & Hobby growth should continue to deliver against conservative expectations. Nexon will go down as one of our bigger analytical errors of 2026... though even here range-low PE multiples and renewed cash returns should offer some support.

So you want AI ROI? A year ago, the debate across our Japan Video Gaming coverage focused on whether these companies might be too conservative to move quickly on AI adoption. Capcom now partners with Google on AI, and speaks of cutting 3-5k hours of human playtesting time to 72 hours, and 30,000 hours of autonomous AI testing hours a month. This in turn was said to be contributing to a busier release cadence which has benefited Capcom's mid-sized franchises. Other aspects of video gaming development where AI adoption has become commonplace across our coverage companies include concept and prototyping, localisation drafts, and the analysis of community feedback.

GTA VI a... clearing event? Our tracker of 28 listed video gaming companies globally pointed to 11.3% aggregate revenue growth in the March quarter, which implied c. 4-5% annualised growth against pre-Covid baselines. Consensus projections pointing to industry growth acceleration into the end of 2026 are heavily influenced by the long-awaited GTA VI launch. We've heard every kind of bull case for GTA VI launch sales in recent months. But we do wonder if Godot's arrival will represent a clearing event for our coverage companies in Japan, both because many of them have consciously avoided the holiday 2026 launch window... and in terms of investor flows within global video gaming.

INVESTMENT IMPLICATIONS

2026 continues to represent a challenging year for our Japan Video Gaming coverage. While companies we like, like Capcom and Konami continue to execute well, the flip side of inflows into AI capex beneficiaries has continued to drive valuation multiple de-rating across our coverage. We sympathize with the market's AI bullishness to a large extent, but our gaming coverage now includes several stocks that should compound earnings at double-digit percentages for many years... while trading on forward PE multiples that are materially below multi-year averages.

Capcom and Konami remain our top picks in the sector. We consider both steady compounders that have long growth runways, which now trade on range-low forward PE multiples. Both stocks look well set-up for Q1 beats, and we expect upcoming summer showcases to offer more clarity on their go-forward launch pipelines. Nintendo sentiment has also shown some tentative signs of at least stabilisation.

The changes to our Square Enix, Nexon, Bandai Namco price targets reflect updated earnings estimates, multiplied by unchanged FY+1 PE multiples.

DETAILS

LIVING UNDER THE AI CAPEX SHADOW

This note represents our latest quarterly look at the Japan Video Gaming sector - taking stock of the latest high frequency data, and quarterly reporting across the industry. We've also taken into account full year FY3/27E guidance from the companies we cover, and thoughts following a series of meetings we recently hosted with our coverage companies in Japan.

At a high level, this continues to be a frustrating year for the sector, as flows in favor of AI capex beneficiaries have continued to weigh on multiples - even in the case of companies that are doing well, where we think Street estimates remain much too low. Sentiment among gaming-focused investors we speak with border on resignation, with discussions on exit valuation multiples still skewed towards further de-rating because of excitement elsewhere. It's been notable that the best days for our stocks have coincided with positioning unwinds elsewhere.

We're AI bulls at a high level, and it's hard to fault investors bidding up stocks on the basis of a generational capex build out, and price increases. A broader worldview dominated by geo-strategic competition, consumer repression, and capex-led growth argues against consumer-oriented sectors beyond video gaming. On the flip side, the companies themselves continue to execute well, and it does feel somewhat notable that some investors we speak with are starting to shift focus towards how to stick the landing on their AI capex investments.

It should eventually matter that the Japan Video Gaming sector is now home to a few stocks where multi-year double-digit earnings growth trajectories are now valued meaningfully below long-term average multiples. It should eventually matter that AI helps to accelerate video gaming development. The "when" remains a tricky question to answer, but the elastic band of positioning likely works in both directions when it does.

Capcom, Konami on sale - thoughts from meeting our coverage companies

Last week we spent several days in Japan, traveling with investors to visit our coverage companies. The takeaways from these meetings were helpful on several fronts. Stock-picking wise, Capcom and Konami continue to strike us as the clearest names in the sector, where fundamentals look solid both on the basis of near-term earnings set-ups, and medium-term growth trajectories. Both companies sounded confident, and in our view look set to comfortably clear Street expectations for FY3/27E earnings. Both stocks now trade on forward PE meaningfully below long-term averages... and (perhaps a quaint concept in the current environment) the sum of discounted future cash flows.

For Capcom, Pragmata sales were indicated to be ahead of plan versus what's embedded in Capcom's guidance for 12mn new units in FY3/27E. The company promised more information on the MH Wilds expansion title "over the summer" - we think launch will be in the company's typical February/March slot. Gold (including the base game) and Switch 2 editions for MH Wilds feel likely to us too. Konami confirmed the accuracy of very strong-looking Sensor Tower data in Q1. The debate around Konami's shares continues to focus partly on the post-World Cup monetisation pull back. But user growth within the game remains strong, and Konami stands to benefit meaningfully from lower platform fees in the next couple years - which the company indicated will fall mostly to operating profit.

Memory prices remain the obvious headwind for Nintendo and Sony. Nintendo in particular remains firmly stuck in the "memory losers" basket for many investors, and 2026 is now commonly described as a write-off (Sony's shares may be benefitting from excitement around the TSMC JV). But here too we think a stronger 2027 means asymmetry in the stock potentially starts to look interesting on a one-year view. In our meeting, Nintendo signaled a willingness to use remake titles to augment the first-party launch cadence, which sounded confirmatory of recent online chatter over the 2026-2027 line-up (e.g. Ocarina of Time remake), but also potentially opens up possibilities down the line.

On the flip side, our meetings left us with questions on how Bandai Namco might live up to its guidance for strong Digital profits in H2 FY3/27E. Dragon Ball Xenoverse 3 was confirmed by partners to be a FY3/28E title. Square Enix guidance sounded sensible for the most part, and growth in catalog sales raises the floor for the company's HD games segment. But the latest delay in Dragon Quest XII development felt indicative of the task facing management leading up to the next medium term plan. Nexon's H2 turnaround also felt like a work in progress, contingent on stabilisation in China... but forward valuation multiples have fallen to bargain-basement levels.

Encouraging feedback on AI gains in video gaming development - Capcom the poster child

A year ago, the debate on AI use in the Japan Video Gaming sector centred around whether the Japanese industry would be too conservative to adopt AI broadly, and therefore become an AI laggard. A year on, several of the companies we met with reported tangible progress. On our travels, Capcom offered the most concrete feedback on areas where AI adoption was already beginning to yield productivity gains. The company is a Google partner (remember when Project Genie was supposed to disrupt budget gaming?), and recently published an example where agentic AI was used to compress 3-5k hours of human playtesting time to 72 hours of compute. The company now runs 30,000 playtesting hours a month with AI help. Other areas where AI was described by our companies as having seen meaningful productivity uplifts included during the concept and prototyping stages, production workflows like localization drafts, the design and production of marketing creatives, and the analysis of community feedback.

Most of our coverage companies signalled an aversion to putting AI generated assets in-game, which is probably sensible in the context of the potential for online fan resistance. Putting a number on the financial value of AI gains remains a tricky endeavour. But hearing Capcom signal a greater capacity for new game releases beyond the big annual title (e.g. Pragmata, Onimusha this year) was encouraging evidence that productivity gains are beginning to show up in release capacity.

We remain of the view that video gaming will go from being perceived as “disrupted by AI” around Google’s Project Genie announcement to one of the hardest things for AI to displace - reflecting the complexity of video games as multimedia entertainment products, but also the fact only the 99.9th percentile product matters to investors.

The industry backdrop - could GTA VI be a clearing event?

Exhibit 4 shows our updated tracker of listed video gaming company revenues, while Exhibit 5 compares annualised industry growth with 2018-2019 baselines. On a year on year basis, our tracker of 28 companies pointed to 11.3% aggregate revenue growth. On a NTM basis, aggregate industry revenue is projected to grow 7.3% year on year. In our meetings with our coverage companies, GTA VI unsurprisingly came up repeatedly as a sink for gamer attention. From current valuation levels, though, we’re tempted to think that the GTA VI launch will serve as a clearing event for global gaming ex. Take-Two - including our Japan Video Gaming coverage.

QUALITY ON SALE

If Japan Video Gaming sector valuations went from expensive across the board in the summer of 2025 to "okay" to start 2026, we're now firmly in "below average" territory. The average stock we cover now trades on 19.7x FY3/27E and 17.7x FY3/28E PE, and 11.9x FY3/27E and 10.11x FY3/28E EV/EBIT, taking into account the impact of balance sheet cash (see Exhibit 7 to Exhibit 12).

Our price targets are generally set on the basis of FY+1 (i.e. quarter 5-8) PE multiples, but it seems reasonable to expect valuation time frames to shift towards FY3/28E PE in the next six months or so.

CAPCOM: STILL MAKING IT LOOK EASY

Our discussions with Capcom in Osaka yielded several interesting data points. Pragmata was confirmed to have exceeded internal targets baked into Capcom's 12mn new units guidance for FY3/27E. A reveal of the expansion title for MH Wilds now feels beyond question, following the company's promise of updates "over the summer". Management framed both their latest 10% operating profit growth goal (to JPY83bn) and use of 140 USD:JPY as intentionally conservative. We estimate Capcom's operating profit rises by just over 1% for every 1% of yen depreciation, and we'd expect the company to comfortably exceed its operating profit target even assuming a considerable front-loading of R&D spend.

Shorter term, the reversal of JPY9bn in revenue deferral will boost Q1 reporting, as will strong Pragmata sales... and ongoing strength in RE Requiem and other Resident Evil catalog titles through April and May. Our base case remains that the MH Wilds expansion game will fill its typical February/March slot. In addition to let's say a 30% attach rate on 12-13mn units of MH Wilds sold at that point, we expect a gold edition of the game - and expansion game bundles - to support Capcom's software units. Dataminers previously found Switch 2 code in one of the MH Wilds updates - a Switch 2 launch for the gold edition would make sense timing wise, and likely add another 300-500k units.

Thinking longer-term, we consider Capcom the most forward-thinking company in our Japan Video Gaming coverage, when it comes to addressing the AI question. The company's example of significant reductions to playtesting time was mentioned as part of its partnership with Google, and management cited gains in other parts of development, including concept, prototyping, and localisation. Encouragingly, the company pointed to the Pragmata and Onimusha launches this year as examples where expanded headcount and AI productivity gains had enabled a greater focus on the company's second tier of IP franchises.

With this note we've made some minor adjustments to our Capcom estimates (see Exhibit 18).

KONAMI: GROWTH EXTENDS BEYOND THE WORLD CUP

In our minds, Konami also fits into the category of a quality name with obvious catalysts that's been hurt by AI-related outflows. Q1 earnings should significantly exceed street estimates, with eFootball billings jumping month on month in both April and May, and expected to continue to rise sequentially in June and July. The recent Naruto and 1bn downloads campaigns were said to have contributed 10-20% to recent incremental growth, but recent strength was described as not yet related to World Cup excitement (see Exhibit 19).

World Cup billings aside, our most recent discussions with Konami pointed to off platform monetisation having started across 20-30 countries in addition to Japan. Initial traction was said to have largely aligned with Konami's home market, and further progress should continue to contribute to eFootball operating margins... versus the low-50% range at present. Across the business, we expect platform fees to fall from high-20% to low-20% in the next two years, which Konami indicated will mostly fall to operating profit. The latest Sensor Tower data points to robust weekly eFootball billings trends - assuming a similar absolute bump in World Cup engagement over the next couple months (e.g. far smaller proportionate to the overall game than in 2022) would imply large beats to Q1 and potentially Q2 expectations. In contrast with the 2022 Qatar World Cup, we're hopeful a longer tournament featuring 48 teams will prolong the period of eFootball billings strength this year.

A period of slower eFootball monetization is probably likely in the back half of 2026. On the other hand, new user growth within eFootball has remained strong across both mobile and PC/console (see Exhibit 21 and Exhibit 22). The expansion of the upcoming World Cup to 48 teams should help to engender greater interest in football video games in new markets. The feedback we've heard also pointed to stronger growth than we'd previously anticipated in Yu-Gi-Oh! cards, and a solid cadence of single-title games (e.g. annual Silent Hill or MGS releases) going forward on top of the usual diet of Power Pros and Momotetsu games.

From a starting point of c. 22x FY3/28E PE, we'd argue Konami's shares already reflect a healthy degree of caution around longer term growth, and think go-forward risk-reward looks positive (see Exhibit 23).

NINTENDO: A STRONGER 2027?

The memory prices question remains an overhang for Nintendo's shares, but our Kyoto visit yielded several incremental data points which felt, in aggregate, helpful for go-forward growth visibility. On production rates, Nintendo acknowledged the incentive to produce ahead of sell-in, to take advantage of better than feared memory pricing in FY3/27E. Guidance that hardware gross profit will remain flattish year on year this year reflected Nintendo's $50 of price increases, but also pricing negotiations which started relatively early on, and a tariff burden that's most likely no worse year on year. Our base case remains for incremental memory price headwind in FY3/28E, but for the next few quarters guidance that spot price volatility will not cause the JPY100bn of cost headwind guidance to change felt encouraging on the margin.

On the software front, the company acknowledged facing longer game development cycles on its largest AAA titles, and using B-franchise titles as a way to populate the launch cadence. Interestingly, the company confirmed an openness to using remake titles to augment the first-party launch line-up, which felt supportive of ongoing fan speculation over a Zelda title this year. Marketing spend was guided lower this year versus FY3/26, on account of the non-repeat of live events related to the Switch 2 launch. Investors we speak with remain focused on Nintendo's hardware margin, and the likelihood of further incremental hardware cost headwinds. But a software line-up featuring Pokémon Wind & Waves (and finally 3D Mario??) would probably make the next $50 price increases more palatable, if the need arose.

On Nintendo's guidance, we think it's worth clarifying that the 60mn units of Switch 2 software guided for FY3/27E excludes Switch games bought by Switch 2 owners for their new devices (we think Nintendo made a mistake not classifying these as Switch 2 games, which has led to unnecessary confusion)... or bundle units like the recent Pokopia bundle. Nintendo's 105mn unit guide for Switch software sales this year was confirmed to have included a greater volume of sales on Switch 2 devices than last year.

With this note we've made adjustments to our Nintendo estimates (see Exhibit 27 and Exhibit 28).

NEXON: MEA CULPA... BUT CASH IS NOW 45% OF MARKET CAP

With the benefit of hindsight, we badly misjudged the durability of Arc Raiders as an ongoing contributor to earnings. 2025 was a rebound year, helped by both MapleStory recovery in Korea, and new game launch successes like Mabinogi Mobile.

Looking at the past four quarters ended March, Nexon reported JPY140bn of operating profit, which we think breaks down into c. JPY25-30bn of Arc Raiders (somewhat influenced by the company's deferral of Q1 billings), JPY90bn from China revenue share (on which the main offsetting costs relate to a few hundred people at Neople, we've assumed a 90% gross margin), and JPY 25bn to everything else. Estimated on the same basis, the "everything else" generated a JPY24bn aggregate operating loss in 2024, and JPY25bn of profit in 2025.

Nexon expenses R&D, which means the incremental contribution from new game launches drops more or less straight to operating profit. With the company signaling a barren H2 2026 (which means operating profits decline in Q3, before a very low Q4 comp), the next set of meaningful new launches will need to be DNF Idle RPG (launching in Korea in Q4) and DNF Classic. MapleStory Idle RPG showed the idle game formula can work with Nexon's key IP. In our discussions, Nexon management talked up the outlook for Nakwon, due for launch in 2027. In the interim, however, the direction of DNF in China has continued to trend worse than we'd hoped for. PC at least shows stable visitation - the hope is that the summer and National Day updates do better than the most recent one in April. But DNF Mobile continues to lose ground, on the evidence of DAU and time spent trends. The company's change of tone on marketing spend this year (indicated flat year on year during the company's CMD, now expected to rise to reflect MapleStory Idle RPG spend) also leaves us with mixed feelings.

The question that remains is... now what? The stock has fallen a long way year to date, and expectations are now very low. Assuming say JPY80bn of China contribution next year, and a modest level of new launch success besides implies something like JPY110-120bn of operating profit, which drops down to JPY110 or so of (floor?) EPS. One can of course debate whether 20x or 17-18x floor EPS represents real margin of safety... though the last two times Nexon traded on current multiples on the basis of consensus forward PE multiples marked local minima for the stock. Cash now represents 45% of Nexon's market cap... assuming the company reinstates a JPY100bn buyback (on top of JPY30bn already announced, and JPY35bn of dividends) implies 7% annualized capital return yield.

Exhibit 35 shows a summary of our estimate changes for Nexon. Our latest price target for the company is based on 20x FY+1 PE compared with materially lowered earnings estimates.

SQUARE ENIX: CATALOG SALES GROWTH SUPPORTS PROFITS

We still struggle to be especially constructive on Square Enix's shares, trading on one of the highest forward PE multiples across the sector. The highly-anticipated Dragon Quest XII announcement turning out to be another delay in development felt emblematic of the task facing management to restore the company to a reliable new game launch cadence. That said, for the first time in a while our meeting with Square Enix left us with a sense of progress.

Looking back, the company framed FY3/25 and FY3/26 as years focused on domestic then overseas reorganisation, while organizational upheaval was described as less likely in FY3/27E. Catalog sales should continue to grow, supported by Square Enix putting a wide range of existing games on Switch 2 (see Exhibit 36). The guidance for lower operating profit this year was explained through the lens of non-repeating Final Fantasy x MTG royalties, but described as intentionally conservative. The Evercold expansion for Final Fantasy XIV lands in January 2027 and will therefore only contribute partly to this financial year, but higher MMO revenue year on year should also help to add a sense of stability to the company (see Exhibit 38 and Exhibit 37).

Questions will continue to be asked about Square Enix's ability to launch new games profitably, starting with two mobile games this year, and The Adventures of Elliott in June. But the company's content production account has been cut down to size in recent years, including from a JPY7bn impairment in Q4, which reduces the risk of large losses when the company releases more major titles in FY3/28E and beyond.

With this note we've made some minor adjustments to our Square Enix estimates (see Exhibit 39 and Exhibit 40).

BANDAI NAMCO: THE DIGITAL GUIDE CONTINUES TO WORRY US, BUT...

Our Bandai Namco view continues to be split between confidence that the Toy & Hobby segment will continue to surprise versus a deliberately conservative guide, and the Digital segment where the go-forward pipeline worries us. In our recent discussions, the company sounded confident on Toy & Hobby growth, and progress made in the core Gundam franchise. A “few billion yen” of headwinds from higher energy prices was said to have been embedded in the company's FY3/27E operating profit guidance (see Exhibit 41 and Exhibit 42).

On the flip side, with Dragon Ball Xenoverse 3 confirmed as a FY3/28E title, Bandai Namco's FY3/27E new game launch line-up consists of Ace Combat (2.8mn units expected) and The Blood of Dawnwalker as the clearest volume drivers. Bandai Namco's distribution of EA FC should see a bump during a World Cup year, but the margins on such sales are likely lower. Elden Ring and Nightreign repeat sales most likely decline year on year in FY3/27E. On the Network Content side, SD Gundam will likely see revenues decline year on year, which leaves the company's trio of Japan-only mobile game launches to pick up the slack within Network Content in FY3/27E.

Trading on c. 18x FY3/28E PE on our estimates for the company, Bandai Namco's forward multiples are back to range lows. In our recent discussions, the company's indifferent Digital segment performance has raised questions on whether the company should be valued more like a toy business, using Hasbro or Tomy as the more appropriate peer group. But even this (e.g. Hasbro has averaged 16-17x PE in the longer-term) only implies modest downside. Kadokawa's struggles related to self-publishing just might suggest all is not lost on the FromSoftware front going forward. On the other hand, it does feel somewhat notable that Toei Animation recently started an in-house studio focused on video game development.

With this note we've made some minor adjustments to our Bandai Namco estimates (see Exhibit 43 and Exhibit 44).

EXHIBIT 41: Our base case remains that growth in Bandai Namco's Toy & Hobby business tracks broader anime growth... around the 10% per annum range

EXHIBIT 42: The lack of FromSoftware games in 2026 and 2027 represents a headwind for Bandai Namco... can SD Gundam, repeat sales, Ace Combat 8, and Blood of Dawnwalker get us there?

Source: Source: Corporate reports, Bernstein estimates and analysis.

EXHIBIT 43: Bandai Namco's forward PE multiple now stands almost one standard deviation below the mean since 2019, but the lack of an obvious catalyst remains an issue in our view

RISKS*Nintendo Co Ltd

The main downside risks to our views on Nintendo include (1) execution around the Switch 2 ramp; (2) the market reaction to new game launches - driving software tie ratios on the Switch 2; and (3) operating leverage more broadly - including any impact from volatility in the JPY. Extreme macro or trade related headwinds are lower-probability risks to remain mindful of.

Konami Group Corporation

The main downside risks to our view on Konami and price target relate to (1) the success of key live service franchises like eFootball, baseball, Yu-Gi-Oh!; (2) the success or failure of single title launches; and (3) broader operating leverage. and future game releases. In the event of a severe macro slowdown, there may also be some downside risk to consumer appetite for video gaming.

Capcom Co Ltd

The main downside risks specific to our price target on Capcom relate to (1) the timing and success or failure of new game launches; (2) the company's focus around maintaining high levels of legacy game sales volumes; and (3) broader operating leverage - including any impact from volatility in the JPY. In the event of a severe macro slowdown, there may also be some downside risk to consumer appetite for video gaming.

Bandai Namco Holdings Inc

Aside from the success or failure of individual new launches, the main downside risks specific to our views on Bandai Namco include (1) potential impact a macro slowdown could have on Toy & Hobby revenue growth; (2) the impact of higher oil prices on Toy & Hobby input costs and margins; and (3) competition for the publishing rights to games from top developers (e.g. FromSoftware).

The main upside risks specific to our views on Bandai Namco include (1) higher-than-expected Toy & Hobby revenue growth; (2) the potential impact of lower oil prices on Toy & Hobby input costs and margins; and (3) higher-than-expected sales from the Digital segment.

Nexon Co Ltd

The main downside risks associated with Nexon's business relate to (1) key live service franchises like MapleStory, DNF, and FC in Korea; (2) the success or failure of new game launches; and (3) the company's large exposure to China royalty revenues from Tencent, where the latter maintains a large influence in live operations.

Square Enix Holdings Co Ltd.

The main upside risks to our view on Square Enix and price target relate to (1) the success of key IP franchises like Final Fantasy, Dragon Quest; (2) cost reductions such those supported as the company's attempts to drive off-platform monetisation in mobile; and (3) possible M&A. The main downside risks relate to product failure and cost overruns related to new game launches.
