Bernstein has recently launched on Americas Power and Energy Transition (The American Energy Transition: Grid, Gas, and Green - Sector Initiation - Power and Energy Transition) including a proprietary US power model. That new forecast strongly informs our gas demand into power. We update our US gas model accordingly and update most recent data across power, LNG, other demand and supply. We reiterate our long term mid-cycle gas price deck of $5/mcf.

We argue gas demand growth is 3 pronged:

- As LNG capacity continues to expand, LNG liftings will grow in tandem from ~18 bcfd in early 2026 to ~33 bcfd in late 2030 (Exhibit 17).

- We project aggregate power demand to grow at a 2.6% CAGR through 2030 (Exhibit 2), with gas making up a large percentage of the fuel mix (Exhibit 3).

- As supply increases (but also remains disciplined), we expect losses from extraction, plant use, and distribution to consume more gas linearly (Exhibit 9).

We continue to highlight supply discipline in the Permian (the largest source of gas growth associated with shale oil drilling) as well as the Appalachia basin (Exhibit 11). Since the start of 2024, Permian and Appalachian rig counts are down 25% and 21%, respectively.

We also observe the tick up in rigs in the Haynesville that suggest increased activity, but we argue that this growth comes from operators with traditionally lower IPs (Exhibit 15).

We actually saw declines in rig count from higher quality operators in the Haynesville including GEP and EXE (Exhibit 16), with major growth coming from APEX Natural Gas (formerly Paloma Natural Gas), operators with historically lower gas production per well in the cohort we benchmarked in our previous note, Americas Energy & Transition: What the future decades hold for the Haynesville Shale.

Our Permian gas outlook has been updated with increased future takeaway capacity... with more capacity coming online from expansions such as the Transwestern desert pipeline expansion from 1.5 to 2.3 bcfd and the 2.8 bcfd Saguaro connector pipeline (Exhibit 19).

We provide a summary to the updates we made from our previous model (Exhibit 10).

We continue to see significant upside in Henry Hub-levered equities (EQT, EXE, DVN).

INVESTMENT IMPLICATIONS

We believe that $5/mcf is the appropriate mid-cycle price for Henry Hub. As such we continue to see significant upside in Henry Hub-levered equities (EQT, EXE, DVN) which we are rate out perform.

DETAILS

LONG TERM - SIGNIFICANT GAS DEMAND GROWTH TO 2030

We remind investors of our long term bullish thesis (The Long View: A US gas supercycle is coming...we upgrade gassy E&Ps).

Without invoking industrial, commercial or residential demand growth, we forecast ~24% growth in gas demand by 2030 on the back of LNG exports, power demand and growing the volumes of gas supply required to distribute the new gas demand.

EXHIBIT 1: Three pillars grow gas demand by 24% by 2030

Source: EIA; Bloomberg; Baker Hughes; Enverus; Company reports; Bernstein estimates & analysis

As we update our US power model, power demand growth provides significant growth in gas demand used in generation.

EXHIBIT 2: We expect aggregate US power demand to grow at a 2.6% CAGR from 2025-2030...

Source: EIA; Bernstein analysis

EXHIBIT 3: ...with gas assuming a large piece of the pie

Source: EIA, Bernstein analysis

EXHIBIT 4: We expect gas demand for power to grow at a 2.5% CAGR through 2030

Source: EIA; Bernstein analysis

Obviously, one of our pillars for gas bullishness is the growing use of gas for power demand (both AI and other end uses). Such demand growth did not arrive in 2025 mostly due to coal switching (AE&T: What coal stole explains the majority of the summer gas price move...but winter is coming). We explicitly include such switching but argue additional coal switching is limited (Coal/gas switching matters... for gas bulls it's a modest impact, and higher gas means higher rail rates). As data center build out progresses, we expect power demand for gas to grow ~2 bcf/d in 2026 rising towards ~6 bcf/d by 2030 from 2025. We note that power demand for gas this year is entering the strong demand season well above last year and even above the previous record year of 2024.

EXHIBIT 5: Power demand for gas flattish year on year

Growth in LNG liftings remains a key part to our thesis.

EXHIBIT 6: We project that as LNG capacity continues to expand, LNG lifting to grow with it

Source: EIA, Bernstein analysis and estimates

While recom demand should be seasonal and flattish.

EXHIBIT 7: We conservatively project flat residential and commercial gas demand

Source: EIA, Bernstein analysis and estimates

To achieve more than 150 bcfd by 2030 requires heavy lifting by the constrained Permian (41% growth), constrained Appalachia (13% growth), Haynesville (65% growth) and even so the balance isn't met - we believe $5/mcf is required to convince the upstream to deliver the required molecules.

EXHIBIT 8: Achieving 154 BCFD of demand in 2030 will require 'heavy lifting' from all basins...and more

We contrast our current model with the previous edition (December 2025). Marking 2026 to market creates more demand than previously expected. 2030 values rise significantly on LNG projects and is trimmed by a slightly lower power demand forecast.

In terms of supply, 2026 supply changes add significantly to Haynesville with other basins unchanged. We still see 2026 demand higher than 2026 supply which anticipates stronger prices towards year end.

2026 BEGINS WITH SUPPLY SIDE DISCIPLINE

We highlight supply discipline, particularly in the Permian (the largest source of gas growth associated with shale oil drilling) and Appalachian basins. Since early 2024, Permian and Appalachian rigs are lower by 25% and 21%, respectively.

Haynesville rig counts have ticked up sharply in 2026 with 12 rigs added during the three-month period beginning January and ending March 2026.

EXHIBIT 11: Horizontal Rig Trends for Permian, Appalachia, and Haynesville

Source: Baker Hughes; Bernstein analysis

We can compare rig count (scaled down by a factor of 10), gas price and Haynesville production. Note that rig counts of 53 are insufficient to deliver a return to previous Haynesville levels of 16.7 bcf/d, not to mention much higher levels 'demanded' by our supply-demand balances. However we note the jump in rig count from 40 in November 2025 to 53 in March 2026, signifying an uptick in activity.

EXHIBIT 12: Haynesville rig count at 53 rigs...we argue 60 is required to get basin back to former 16.7 bcf/d level

Source: EIA; Bloomberg; Baker Hughes; Enverus; Bernstein analysis

Current quarter's pipeline scrapes have been steadily creeping up.

EXHIBIT 13: Haynesville production has steadily been creeping up

Source: Bloomberg; Bernstein analysis

It is important to realize a significant lag exists between changes in rig count and production response. The best correlation suggests an 8-month lag. If rig count increases significantly at Christmas, expect August deliveries.

EXHIBIT 14: The best correlation between changes in Haynesville production versus changes in Haynesville rig count is a 8 month lag

RIG QUALITY

Although we see absolute Haynesville rig count climbing, we highlight the growth comes from operators with lower historical cumulative gas production per well.

EXHIBIT 15: Although absolute Haynesville rig count is up, overall well quality is declining

Except XOM lack of 2024 data and thus use 2023 data instead.

Aethon was acquired by Mitsubishi and has transitioned to Adamas. Paloma was acquired by Citadel (Hedge Fund) and renamed Apex.

Source: Enverus, Bernstein analysis

The above comparison of operator quality (cummulative gas production/well) is from our previous note on the Haynesville (Americas Energy & Transition: What the future decades hold for the Haynesville Shale).

Major growth in rigs between January 2026 and June 2026 came from Aethon (now Adamas) and Paloma Natural Gas (now Apex) (Exhibit 16). Rig decline came from GEP and Expand, two of the highest quality operators.

2025 ENDS WITH A SURGE OF LNG

LNG capacity should grow ~15 bcf/d to ~33 bcf/d by 2030. With sufficient global demand, we expect LNG lifting to match capacity. Note that 2028-2030 volumes could be larger if faster-cycle LNG projects are sanctioned in 2026-2028 and de-bottlenecking continues to beat expectations.

EXHIBIT 17: U.S. LNG demand for natural gas - we expect projects to run at full capacity

*capacity is peak nameplate capacity

The majority of LNG exports are to Europe and we expect a price linkage. We'd argue mid-cycle TTF is HH plus ~$5.50/mmbtu and bottom-cycle "sinks" take-or-pay liquefaction fees and bottom ~$7.50/mmbtu. We assume an average of ~$9/mmbtu for TTF for '26 and '27 as markets absorb the large ramp in LNG (both US and other).

LAYING OUT OUR CURRENT GAS SUPPLY VIEW TO 2030

We start with the largest oil producing basin - the Permian. We show the growth of associated gas from the basin lined up against pipeline takeaway. We broadly expect sufficient takeaway with occasional quarters in which takeaway becomes fully used and pricing in-basin collapses (such as the current situation). Going forward we expect roughly 1.6 bcf/d year-on-year of growth in Permian gross withdrawals. We note that our forecast suggests under-filled Permian pipelines in the out years, as pipeline capacity expands with the additions of Eiger, Saguaro, and Apex. We also highlight the potential for pipeline capacity expansion as the previously announced Transwestern Desert pipeline was recently unsized in December 2025 from 1.5 bcf/d to 2.3 bcf/d due to “strong open-season demand” according to the EIA. One might question why would producers sign up for take-away contracts that aren’t filled in the early years? Our answer would be (1) gas takeaway is a cheap option for producers to ensure oil-focused growth can be achieved, (2) we don’t expect Permian oil to grow (and thus the early option expires), and (3) we’ve witnessed under-filled gas pipelines in the Permian in the past.

EXHIBIT 19: We expect associated gas including the Permian to grow +2bcfd/yr on average to 2030

Source: Enverus, Company and news reports, Bernstein analysis and estimates

Considering one of our biggest updates to the model was an increase in projected Permian production, we illustrate that change compared to our previous model.

What our gas forecast implies for oil to gas ratio...rising quickly to record levels.

EXHIBIT 21: We project Permian wells to become gassier in the future with significantly higher GOR (gas to oil) ratios

We argue that Appalachia is similarly pipeline constrained. Below we show the pipeline takeaway. We include “known” in-basin demand as if it were a pipeline. Note that due to seasonality, Appalachia struggles to completely fill takeaway.

EXHIBIT 22: We assume Appalachia stays flattish at ~37 bcfd until the expansion in late 2027

Source: Enverus, Company and news reports, Bernstein analysis and estimates

The Haynesville is significant. Historically, the Haynesville has served as the price-setting (marginal) basin at ~$3.50/mcf. We don't believe that remains the case. We split the Haynesville into a steady-state rate of ~17 bcfd which we assume returns to ~17.5 bcfd and then a 'call on more Haynesville' from our dynamic model. The model 'needs' a level of Haynesville growth that we feel is impossible in the near term.

EXHIBIT 23: We assume Haynesville returns to former peaks under all price decks (~17 bcfd) and then higher price invents additional growth

OTHER SOURCES OF GAS SUPPLY

For associated gas, we show each basin with oil volumes in green and the resulting associated gas in red.

We expect flattish to down Bakken oil and flattish gas (note that the massive GOR increases of the past have moderated).

EXHIBIT 24: Mature Bakken oil drives flattish Bakken gas

Source: Company reports; Bloomberg; Enverus; EIA; Bernstein estimates & analysis

For the Eagle Ford, we highlight the gas growth. Note that Eagle Ford oil production has been flat since 2020 but gas has grown. Such growth is not strictly just GOR but also due to strategic investments. Specifically, EOG brought on the Verde gas pipeline in 2023, adding 1 bcfd of takeaway. Gas in the basin has grown more. We conservatively add another ~2 bcfd of Eagle Ford gas growth (note, by “conservatively”, we mean that such gas growth is punitive for gas price and we want a margin of safety in our bullishness).

EXHIBIT 25: Eagle Ford gas grows as some operators pivot from oil to gas focus

Source: Company reports; Bloomberg; Enverus; EIA; Bernstein estimates & analysis

Rockies oil is expected to decline modestly with gas flat (i.e., modestly increasing GOR).

EXHIBIT 26: Plateauing Rockies oil ties to flattish Rockies gas

Source: Company reports; Bloomberg; Enverus; EIA; Bernstein estimates & analysis

Midcon gas and oil are modest volumes but we hold both flattish.

EXHIBIT 27: Flattish Midcon oil ties with flattish gas

Source: Company reports; Bloomberg; Enverus; EIA; Bernstein estimates & analysis

Another 4.5 bcfd of gas from horizontal wells exist in other basins. We grow that gas on its current trend.

EXHIBIT 28: Gas from horizontal wells in other basins is small (4.5 bcfd) but we extend the trend

Source: Company reports; Bloomberg; Enverus; EIA; Bernstein estimates & analysis

A final 15 bcfd of Lower 48 gas comes from non-horizontal wells (including for example the Gulf of Mexico). We extend the trend.

EXHIBIT 29: Gas from non-horizontal wells continues its trend of declines
