We highlight product mix and price changes (including selective price cuts at Gucci) implemented over 2Q26.

Our rebased 2Q26 tracker sees Chanel leading in terms of 'newness'. 67% of the SKUs on Chanel's French brand.com are likely new compared to the portfolio at the start of the quarter. Prada follows with 52% 'newness', largely concentrated at the bottom-half of its portfolio's price range, with Gucci close behind at 51%. The rate of 'newness' at Dior and Burberry seems to have slowed vs. 1Q26, with 39% and 37% of their current portfolio introduced over the course of 2Q26.

Brands continue to diverge in approach when introducing newness. The bulk of Chanel's portfolio changes occurred across mid-May and early-June following the launch of the 'Métiers d'Art' collection, shown in Dec'25, building on 1Q26's momentum. Dior seems to have taken a more gradual approach: new handbag lines such as the "Milly-La-Forêt" augment updates to existing lines. For example, Dior seems to have taken a page out of Louis Vuitton's 'value for money' playbook by introducing a reversible Dior Toujours.

Gucci continues to take a more 'experimental' approach under Francesca Bellettini and Demna. The brand seems to be applying an initial "drop" strategy for its collections, ahead of a regular launch in-store. For example, "Gucci Primavera" debuted with a 'see now, buy now' opportunity in end-Feb'26 (see Kering: Gucci Primavera 'see now, buy now'), ahead of the full collection arriving in Jul'26. This seems to emulate Moncler's "Genius" strategy, to some extent, and is likely intended to drive much-needed in-store traffic and retail productivity. This adds another layer to how pricing, product and merchandising strategies have diverged (see Global Luxury Goods: Pricing Divergence).

Gucci continues to adjust its product portfolio; it is not above price cuts. We had previously highlighted how "Generation Gucci" marked a slight downshift in the brand's product architecture (see Global Luxury Goods: The Handbag Price & Mix Barometer - 'Generation Gucci' and a more accessible pricing architecture). Interestingly, we also note that Gucci is not above selective price cuts. Global prices for SS26's Mercato Tote Bag were reduced by -20% to -25% (from €2.6k to €1.95k for the small version, in leather, in France) in early-May. This drives a -1% to -2% decline in our calculated LFL pricing, on a simple-average basis, contributing to a likely MSD to HSD sequential decline in the simple-average price of Gucci's overall handbag portfolio in 2Q26.

We believe Gucci faces a relative price/mix headwind, net of price elasticity effects, in 2Q26. Almost all other brands have implemented LSD price increases in 2Q26 and enjoyed positive overall price/mix (Dior being the only other outlier with unchanged LFL prices and negative implied mix) - a key factor to account for when analyzing upcoming 2Q26E and 3Q26E organic growth rates. We caution that our calculations only cover handbags, include some data gaps and will differ from actual, volume-weighted reported rates. Net of price elasticity effects from Gucci's readjusted pricing architecture and improving brand accessibility, however, we believe the relative comparison still holds.

INVESTMENT IMPLICATIONS

Kering's Gucci turnaround remains a 'work in progress'. Our data indicates that Gucci continues to work on increasing brand accessibility. Yet, recent selective price adjustments for newly launched product lines (SS26's Mercato tote bag) also suggest that Demna and the Gucci team have yet to truly re-ignite brand desirability (see Kering: In search of meaning). This has contributed to lackluster brand momentum (see Global Luxury Goods: Chinese & Western Social Media Boxing Ring 2Q26 - Mixed signals), leaving Gucci fully exposed to painful - but likely necessary - price/mix headwinds.

We believe Dior remains a step ahead of Gucci in its own turnaround. Our data points to a less severe price-mix adjustment at Dior. Granted, Jonathan Anderson's reinvigoration of Dior has yet to match Matthieu Blazy's performance at Chanel, but creative merchandising and consistent communication across multiple cultural fronts (from the 'Devil Wears Prada 2' to Taylor Swift's wedding) can only help shrink the gap. Company commentary points to a gradual recovery; we would expect Dior to return to positive growth (see LVMH: Highlights from the 1Q26 conference call).

EXHIBIT 4: However, this readjustment in pricing architecture will likely generate near-term price-mix headwinds on organic growth performance

A Note on Methodology

- We collect data on a weekly basis across six countries: France, the UK, China, the USA, Japan, and the UAE
- We identify like-for-like (LFL) products within our data set, which we define as products with the same SKU number or ID that appear across all time periods, for each region.
- We use this subset of LFL products to calculate a 'LFL Price' change for the period covered.
- We also calculate a portfolio 'Average Price' change, which is a simple average of all prices across the portfolio within each region.
- The 'Implied Mix' change is the difference between the Average Price change and the LFL Price change and largely captures any changes due to mix (e.g. the insertion or removal of differently priced SKUs).
- Caveats to keep in mind:
 - The data collection process is dependent on how SKUs are listed on each brand.com. Even within brands, brand.com design may differ across regions (most commonly for China), or over time (e.g. Louis Vuitton and Chanel have updated their brand.com design over the course of 2026). This could affect the product mix identified within each period and the comparability of data over time.
 - The data collection process is dependent on what SKUs are listed on each brand.com. Certain product lines may be given more prominence in one region than in another (e.g. backpacks in Japan).
 - The data is sometimes subject to data gaps when a product is temporarily removed from the dataset. The product is no longer counted in LFL calculations as a result
 - The data only reflects handbags (and sometimes small leather goods) listed on each brand.com. Our calculations are not necessarily exhaustive and unlikely to be fully representative given the importance of sales-volume-weights.
